A hand-drawn diagram illustrating a river system's flow paths.
 At the bottom left, a pink arrow labeled "Flow from River" points upwards towards a main black line representing a river channel.
 The main channel has several arrows pointing towards it from different directions, representing tributaries or groundwater inputs.
 One arrow originates from a point labeled "Groundwater" on the left, another from a point labeled "Soil water" above the channel, and a third from a point labeled "Snowmelt" further upstream.
 The main channel then splits into two branches, each ending in a pink arrow labeled "Flow to River".
 The entire diagram is drawn in green ink on a white background.
